"There's no real diagnostic test to specifically point to Alzheimer's, but I see no basis for any other diagnosis."

Alzheimer's.

Jack went numb. The word was more than a diagnosis. It was delivered as both a verdict and a sentence. He stared at his grandfather—a slumping, quiet, subdued man unaware of the severity of the words spoken about him—and he burned with ion that had been building in his throat

Book Bio

Jack—devoted husband and father of twin girls—is struggling with his grandfather's recent Alzheimer's diagnosis and the void created in his life as the man he believed indestructible slowly fades away.

Christopher is a bright, but shy eight-year-old trapped in a shell of self-doubt created by the repeated disappointments of his absentee father's broken promises.

Paired together for a weekend father/son campout, they form an unexpected relationship that brings healing, confidence, and hope.

DON'T FORGET is a poignant story about the power of presence and memory in the relationships that shape all of us.

From Chapter Five

Dr. Mahili's office was located in the nondescript professional office building adjacent to the county hospital. The hospital had the look of a once-modern structure slowly slipping into decay. It was larger than most small town hospitals but without bustle or energy pulsating around it. It stood silent, as if cloaked in melancholy and disappointment.

"Why are we here?" Jack's grandfather asked as he followed his wife and his grandson across the tar-black asphalt parking lot.

"Just to talk with the doctor, honey. No tests today," Jack's grandmother patiently replied.

The waiting room of Dr. Mahili's office was deserted, indicative of a new doctor struggling to establish himself in a well-established town. But being the only specialist of his kind, and given the aging of the local population, a busy practice was only a matter of time

Once inside, Jack took a seat beside his grandfather on the thin cushions of the square wooden chairs as his grandmother checked in with the lonely receptionist. The quiet of the room rested on them like a blanket. The anticipation Jack had kept subdued since his grandmother's call two days ago now slipped free and began tightening the strings in his chest. His tension escalated at a surprising rate. His knees bounced frantically, and he found no comfortable position for his hands. He snatched a travel magazine in an attempt to take his mind to another place. As he flipped through glossy pictures of the blue-water serenity of the Pacific waters off Mexico, his grandfather placed his hand on Jack's arm.

"It's good to see you." His grandfather smiled.

"You too, Grandpa."

"Are you good?" The question had a muffled ring of authenticity.

"Yes, very good, Grandpa." Jack paused, searching for an avenue to sustain the connection. "Have I shown you the latest pictures of your great-granddaughters?" Jack's grandfather didn't respond; he just held a hopeful look on his face. Jack retrieved his smart phone and swiped the screen, opening a picture of his two sunny-faced, brown-haired girls. His grandfather brightened.

"Yes, look at them." He traced their faces with his index finger. "They look the same." "Megan and Sara. Megan just cut her hair off so she would look less like her sister. They're good girls."

The sound of the far door opening caught Jack off guard, snapping his attention. A young nurse appeared in the doorway. She was wearing burgundy scrubs and her blonde hair was pulled back into a tight ponytail.

"Mr. O'Brien, are you ready?" the nurse asked. Jack wasn't.
